A student council president is like the captain of a ship. He or she needs to know how to handle many types of situations, be mature, organized, have sound judgment, and possess an ability to work with many different kinds of people. A captain who does not possess these abilities may face a mutiny by the crew, or even a shipwreck. A student council president who lacks the leadership ability to direct council affairs may face an unmanageable student body or council.

Keeping the delicate balance between leading the student council and encouraging other officers, members, and interested students to take on leadership responsibilities is a challenge. In addition, the practical side of being president requires energy, careful management of time, and a good relationship with the student body.

The role of the vice president must be defined with the president. The vice president can become the right hand assisting the president.

The treasurer predicts how money will be used in the future and makes concrete suggestions for saving money and increasing efficiency. To do the job correctly, a treasurer must keep track of all expenditures and add the appropriate transactions to the books. The treasurer should be the person concerned with the regulating flow of money.
